The new ABA web site, launched earlier this month, promises easier navigation and a more user-friendly design.

New ABA web site

The ABA launched its new web site in early October 2001, offering easier navigation and a more user-friendly design.

The new web site contains all of the features and information available on the previous ABA site, but is designed to be clearer and more logical for users.

The improved pages make it easy to move around the site and for people to find information faster.

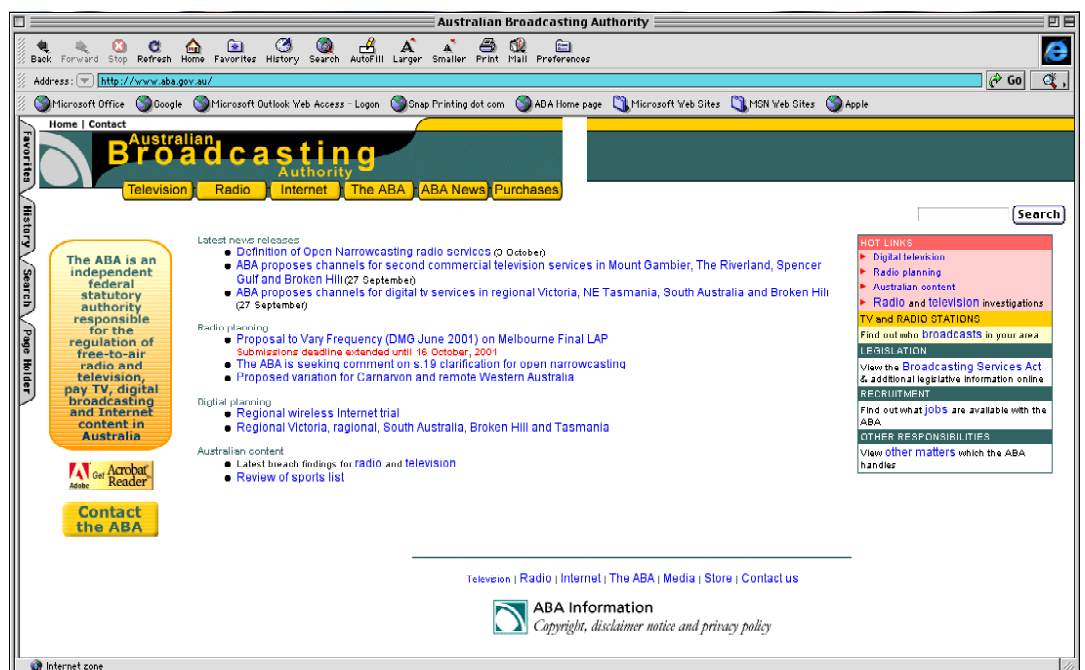

'We really wanted users to know exactly how to find what they were after when they arrived at the site,' said Sally Gillies, ABA Web Coordinator.

'The new web site displays plenty of improved features to help them do this.'

The front page of the web site features a number of buttons directing users to the basic areas managed by the ABA, including television, radio and the Internet, plus information about the ABA itself, news and ordering publications.

A new search facility also means that users can go straight to the information they are seeking, without having to follow numerous links.

The new ABA web site can be found at www.aba.gov.au. When visiting, be sure to press the 'refresh' button in your browser toolbar to access the most up-to-date version of the site.
