

ACMA approach to telecommunications code compliance published

ACMA recently published its approach to telecommunications code compliance, which aims to enhance the effectiveness of self-regulatory telecommunications codes and the quality of the consumer experience in telecommunications. This will be assisted by an active and credible program of compliance measures, both proactive and reactive, supported by enforcement action where necessary.

The approach is consistent with ACMA's broader Regulatory Philosophy in ensuring independence, neutrality, transparency and responsiveness in the self-regulatory space of consumer codes.

The strategy consists of a five-category compliance approach. This approach provides transparency to industry on the likely steps that ACMA will take in situations where it believes that code breaches need to be addressed.

Most compliance activity is expected to occur in the early stages, which are relatively informal, with a clear focus on education and industry self-regulation. The later categories involve using legislative powers. There is a graduated use of regulatory measures using the minimum power or intervention necessary to achieve the desired result.

ACMA retains the discretion to decide where an individual matter falls within the approach and may decide it is appropriate to consider urgent matters at higher categories, on a case by case basis.

The diagram illustrates how the various regulatory measures may be used.
