GRAMPIANS NATIONAL PARK

The Victorian Ministry of Tourism has recommended the restoration of Jardwadjali and Djabwurrang names for rock art sites and landscape features in and around the Grampians National Park. This proposal has the support of five Koorie communities who have cultural responsibility for the places effected in a submission to the Victorian Place Names Committee by the Koorie Tourism Unit it was recommended:

- * that 21 incorrectly spelt Aboriginal place names currently in use be corrected, and that a further 10 names currently in use be renamed;
- * that the Aboriginal names of 44 features which have been given European names be restored;
- * that 11 features with Aboriginal names that do not carry European names be adopted;
- * that the Aboriginal names suggested for 9 rock art sites be adopted.

The submission states:

" The Grampians National Park is one of Victoria's most significant Aboriginal places. It contains the largest concentration of rock art sites in Victoria, and other archeological sites including mounds and scarred trees. The remains of elaborate systems of canals that operated to harvest eels and other fish remain at Mt William and Toolondo swamps, and they are representative of extensive of extensive resource management systems. Yet despite this heritage, there is a pronounced absence of traditional Aboriginal place names... Place names and language are an important part of Koorie culture and are an important part of this country's history.(p.5)"

The submission details the rationale for the restoration of Aboriginal place names in the Grampians National Park, the meaning, the significance, spelling and pronunciation of Aboriginal place names amongst other information.
