Online data analysis service

HOW DOES a corporate librarian determine whether a new service is needed? Is it because a certain number of requests have been made for particular information? If so, then what happens when a system that provides unique capabilities becomes available, a system based on a new concept?

Librarians are the first to recognise that in the present economic environment in Australia executives are seeking cost effective procedures to help them in decision making. Up-to-date, accurate information is needed on which to base these decisions.

I.P. Sharp provides the world's largest collection of online numeric data bases, making available over 30 million series, stored on a central computer and accessed through a terminal or micro-computer in your office. We differ from other information services in providing systems that allow for manipulation and charting of data in addition to simple retrieval programs. We provide the capability to combine data from several sources in one report or graph, a service becoming essential to brokers, corporate planners, economists and financial analysts.

We know this because there have been instances recently when we have received 4-5 inquiries from different departments within a particular corporation; not a very efficient situation.

We have found that librarians are by far the best people for clarifying and organising the overall needs of the employees, and are usually able to get the information needed more quickly, when given the opportunity.

Hence, the impetus of this article, to go directly to the source and inform librarians of an online data analysis service that is extremely beneficial for people who are making financial decisions. We have received enquiries from all levels, yet they are seldom initiated by librarians.

The I.P. Sharp Online Data Analysis service

Users of the company's data network have access to time series on a variety of levels.

At the aggregate level, data bases such as the Australian Bureau of Statistics, the Australian Stock Exchange Indices and International Financial Statistics are ideal for economists. Another data base lists fifty economic forecasts in text for 35 countries, predicting a country's economy, discussing the factors influencing it, and predicting precisely the gross domestic product and other important indicators.

At the company level, STATEX and AGSM (Australian Graduate School of Management), provide yearly balance sheet information as well as some already calculated facts, to allow faster analysis of a company's performance. These include an accounting BETA, which is a measure of the risk involved in buying shares in a company; and the ZSCORE formula of Castagna-Matolcsy, which has been successful in the prediction of corporate failure. Daily trading statistics on the Sydney Stock Exchange are also available on this level. I.P. Sharp has company data for the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom for those interested in overseas markets.

There are data bases on the international level ranging from information on currency exchange rates to facts on the U.S. Economic Statistics, gathered by Citibank Economics Department.

Consistent methods of accessing data allow for combining data from a variety of sources into one single application, whether it be to perform market share analysis, colour plotting, forecasting, year-to-year comparisons, analysis of trends, or simply to report data. If you wish you can also store your own private data on the I.P. Sharp System for instant searching or retrieval. The ability to combine your own company's data with public data provides a very powerful analysis tool. All these skills can be learned in courses offered by I.P. Sharp.

The Sharp Communications Network provides local telephone access to the time-sharing service from over 500 cities worldwide. These now include Sydney, Melbourne, Canberra and Brisbane. Elsewhere access can be achieved through the OTC MIDAS NETWORK.

I.P. Sharp makes no charge for use of the data over its normal timesharing charges, except in a few cases where the data supplier imposes a charge. That is, Sharp does not impose subscription fees for any data base, nor charge for the number of data items read. The system can be accessed with an assortment of different terminals or with a micro-computer with communications capability. Many new users find that they already have the equipment necessary for getting started in their offices. This means that there is no initial investment associated with the service.

I.P. Sharp is a worldwide system proved by time and experience. System developments and improvements have been made continually providing the most elaborate range of both Australian and International financial and economic data available on-line today.
