

EDITORIAL

As yet only three years old, the Law Review has continued to expand its activities in 1969. Through the efforts of the Faculty a permanent headquarters has been secured in the new Auckland University Arts Building. Also, for the first time, a larger editorial committee of four members was used. In view of the likelihood of an increasing circulation in the future, these advances should prove invaluable. The editors thank especially all the members of the Faculty of Law at Auckland University. Their continued co-operation and assistance has ensured a successful future of the Review.

The editors also extend their thanks to our business manager Mr David Abbott. Due to the efforts of Mr Abbott and his predecessors the Review has acquired a large degree of financial independence. For their financial assistance we also thank the Students' Association Publications Committee, and again the Faculty of Law.

In matters of format and publication the 1969 Review follows closely the pattern adopted by the previous editors. We hope we have maintained the high standard of presentation achieved in 1968.

Finally, we thank all those who offered papers to the Review. As in previous years the standard has been high, and the policy of restricting articles to undergraduate contributors has continued to prove justified.
